A morning above freezing—well above freezing—but don't get used to it. While schools are back to the business of education today, another blast of cold air is on our western horizon, and by tomorrow morning, we should be back to single digits—again. And with the blast, some snow could pass through the area, the National Weather service giving us a possible hour of snow this afternoon—3 to 4pm, then temperatures dropping into the mid 20's. By Thursday morning, we should be back to at least the lower range of double-digit lows—around 12, but no other precipitation after Tuesday, then by next weekend, back to normal range for temps—just like three of the weekends in January.
